Proposed cemetery stirs unrest, raises groundwater concerns in Riverside County community

Plans for a proposed cemetery in Riverside County are meeting resistance from residents in the Meadowbrook area, including concerns that it could contaminate groundwater.

At the Ruff Family Ranch in Riverside County, owner Blake Ruff is working to turn his property into a thriving organic farm. But he says a proposed project just steps away is threatening it all.

"Pretty much from here on, that's bodies, 20,000 bodies," Ruff said looking over a vacant property in Meadowbrook.

The nearly 85-acre site is the proposed location for Crescent Gardens Cemetery, run by the Muslim Mortuary & Cemetery Committee, which already operates four other cemeteries in Southern California. This one would be their first standalone Muslim cemetery.

Ruff says the type of burial planned raises concerns about his farm's water supply.

New cemetery planned for rural Riverside County alarms neighbors

Crescent Gardens Cemetery would have 20,000 burial plots overlooking Canyon Lake

Blake Ruff is not swayed by Riverside County saying there's no danger to the water table from a proposed cemetery near Ruff Ranch in the unincorporated community of Meadowbrook, which is southwest of Perris and northwest of Canyon Lake. A proposed cemetery overlooking Canyon Lake in southwest Riverside County has nearby residents alarmed about what it will mean for their rural neighborhood.

If approved, the 85-acre Crescent Gardens Cemetery would include a 25-acre gravesite with roughly 20,000 burial plots. The site is in the unincorporated Meadowbrook neighborhood
